During all the twenty-six days in the hospital she remained in a trance-like state, and until to-day all efforts to review her were futile.

The physicians have decided that her condition is due to a blood clot having formed in her brain. This oaused a paralysis of the right side. To-day she could move only her left hand, but it is believed that her having awakened indicates that the clot is being absorbed, and will eventually disappear. In that case all will go well with her, but if the clot should turn to pus she will die. Her chances for a gradual recovery are good, though her progress will be watched with anxiety.

For several months the boy has been thinking of going on the stage if he could get the opportunity, and as supplementary work to his school duties he has been writing a few tragedies and melodramas.

During the afternoon the boy packed his trunk with everything that belonging to any other member of the family. No one knew what he was doing in his room. After dinner in the evening the boy left the house, saying he was going out to see some friends. When he had not returned at midnight it was found that his trunk was gone.

He is believed to have had a small amount of money of his own. He wore a new gray raglan coat, a blue serge suit, a plaid cap and low black shoes. He was familiarly known as the best-dressed boy in the neighborhood.
